Stephen could see it plainly enough now against the leaden sky. It was a schooner; he could make out its two masts, with fore and aft sails, and its square yards forward. It was an Irish schooner; he could recognise its heavy hull and bollowed out water. It was tacking against wind and tide from the north-east; it was a Dublin schooner at Ramsey. Stephen Orry had been in the act of putting about when this object caught his eye, but now a strange thing occurred. All at once his late troubles lay back in his mind, and by a sort of unconscious mechanical habit of intellect he began to put familiar ideas together. This achooner that was coming from Iceland would be heavy laden; it would have whalsbone, and eider-down, and tallow. If it ran ashore and was wrecked some of this cargo might be taken by someone and sold for something to a French smuggler that lay outside the Chicken Rocks That lamp on the Point of Ayro was the only sea-light on this north coast of the island, and it hang by a rope from a pole.
